Children's Abilities and Interests

Strengths-based assessment practices are used to identify a child's strengths, the abilities and interests. If you have observed certain things or have evidence that he or she uses during participation in everyday activities, you could consider helping the child to identify these strengths when he is in a strengths-based everyday learning activities, supporting the child's participation in the activities, and interacting with the child in ways that build on the child's strengths to promote new learning.

Learning Guide: Identifying Child Strengths

You'll know the practice is working if ...
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children become more independent by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.
- Children (NAEYC): children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children perceive themselves as effective and disabled by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.

Identifying Child Strengths

Strengths-based assessment practices are used to identify a child's strengths, the abilities and interests. If you have observed certain things or have evidence that he or she uses during participation in everyday activities, you could consider helping the child to identify these strengths when he is in a strengths-based everyday learning activities, supporting the child's participation in the activities, and interacting with the child in ways that build on the child's strengths to promote new learning.

Learning Guide: Identifying Child Strengths

You'll know the practice is working if ...
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children become more independent by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.
- Children (NAEYC): children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children perceive themselves as effective and disabled by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.

Identifying Child Strengths

Strengths-based assessment practices are used to identify a child's strengths, the abilities and interests. If you have observed certain things or have evidence that he or she uses during participation in everyday activities, you could consider helping the child to identify these strengths when he is in a strengths-based everyday learning activities, supporting the child's participation in the activities, and interacting with the child in ways that build on the child's strengths to promote new learning.

Learning Guide: Identifying Child Strengths

You'll know the practice is working if ...
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children become more independent by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.
- Children (NAEYC): children enjoy participation in everyday activities from online resources.
- Children are engaged in activities that match their interests and abilities.
- Children (NAEYC): children perceive themselves as effective and disabled by building on child strengths in everyday learning opportunities.